In the previous NAAIC Newsletter it was reported the MACSA was making plans to mark the Gulf Oil recruiter's presence on the University of Wisconsin's campus, which was scheduled for November 17. The Wisconsin Student Association had sent a letter to Gulf, inviting their representative to a luncheon on that date in order to discuss the company's investments. A response was never received from Gulf. Eventually we learned from the University Placement Service that Gulf had decided not to send a recruiter to the UW campus this year, as the company was in the process of "re-evaluating" its college recruitment program. Whether Gulf's decision not to send a recruiter to Madison was related to local plans to have a confrontation with them is unknown.

Nevertheless, despite the absence of the Gulf recruiter, NACSA and CALA went ahead with plans to have a local focus on Gulf's policies of exploitation overseas, primarily in Angola and Latin America. No demonstrations were held, but representatives of MACSA and CALA and the Afro-American Center were interviewed for an hour and a half on a radio talk show about Gulf and Polaroid. On November 17 Sharfudine Khan, FRELIMO's representative in New York City, spoke to high school and university groups about the struggle in Mozambique, dwelling to some extent on US corporate involvements in Southern Africa. In addition, MACSA and CALA have submitted a series of articles about Gulf's activities in Angola and Bolivia, and about Gulf Boycott in the US, to one of the local campus newspapers.

For the remainder of the year, MACSA has launched a major fund-raising campaign. Our goal is to raise $2,000 for the purchase of medicines and supplies for MPLA and FRELIMO in Angola and Mozambique respectively.

MACSA's second major research project and publication, dealing with relationships and parallels between South Africa and Israel, has just been revised. Recently we heard that the original version of the pamphlet was translated into Arabic and published in the press organ of the PFLP, AL HADAF. Copies of the second edition are available, now, at 30 cents per copy, or at special bulk rates.
